END OF "THE TENDERLOIN."

ANTHONY COMSTOCK HAS THE PROPERTY AND THE HEAD OF THE COMPANY IS IN THE TOMBS.

Elmer Garretson, president of the corporation responsible for the publication known as "The Tenderloin," was fined $250 in Special Sessions yesterday, having pleaded guilty to a charge of independent publication. Anthony Comstock, through whose society Garretson's arrest was secured, made an appeal to the Court in the prisoner's behalf, saying that Garretson had given him entire possession of "The Tenderloin's" property, and that the weekly periodical would no longer be issued.

Garretson further said that Garretson had been out of the city, and personally was not aware of the indecent character of the matter published in the paper, and was merely the legal head of the corporation. He had protested to the editors, and during his stay in the city so modified the tenor of its articles that the postal authorities accepted it as mail matter for the first time, having previously refused it.

Justice Jerome, in passing sentence, said that if the publications were not to end, the Court would continue its imprisonment. Instead of a fine of $250, in default of payment of the fine Garretson must serve sixty days in the city prison. Not having the money Garretson was committed to the Tombs.

He charged conspiracy, alleging that Croker had conspired to make Hess a Commissioner so as to secure his Republican vote to make Devery Chief of Police. He also said that Croker paid Hess $100,000 for his services.

Magistrate Flammer said he would have to require a sworn affidavit, and Kahn had the document ready. The Magistrate told Kahn that he would decide the case later.
